Exploring Mexico

North America's new hotspot for mining

With Edmundo Uribe, Yale Resources

For many of us, Mexico is a place to which you dream of going when the temperature starts to drop. But there is more to Mexico than sunny beaches and a cold cerveza.

According to the Fraser Institute, Mexico is one of the 20 most attractive regions in the world for exploration and mining. And of the 209 foreign mining companies currently exploring in Mexico, 75% are Canadian.

Through policy changes and the development of the Mining Development Plan, Mexico has actively encouraged national and foreign exploration of mineral deposits. This, along with a strong mining culture, excellent geology, political stability, favourable tax and permitting structures and the recent change allowing non-Mexican companies to maintain 100% ownership of their properties, make Mexico an investment opportunity to consider.

Edmundo Uribe, a Director at Yale Resources and a Mexican born entrepreneur will be telling us more about the potential opportunities that exist in Canada's next-next-door neighbor and 5th largest export destination. He has a greater than 20 year relationship with the mining and exploration industry that created a wide ranging list of contacts (from industry to government) in Mexico, the United States and Canada.

Join us and find how Mexican public policy has increased Mining opportunities in Mexico.
